

CHARM PHOTOGRAPHY

A woman with dark hair, wearing a red and black horizontally striped one-piece swimsuit, is posing with her arms raised and hands open. She is looking upwards with a slight smile. The background is a plain, light color.

annual

FEATURING

RAWLINGS

ENGSTED • BEATTIE

STEARNS • STRATE • JOFFÉ

DE DIENES • GOWLAND

CHRISTA • PRIGENT

YULSMAN • DE MORGOLI

and many others

100 top fashion and beauty pictures life studies and portraits

16 master-lensmen reveal secrets of their photo-art

This pose of Rebecca Haysen (see page 84) is nothing more than John Kaplan's skilful use of lighting and props for dramatic effect.

CHARM PHOTOGRAPHY contents

BARLINGER
PAGE 14

STRATE
PAGE 24

CHRISTY
PAGE 34

EMSTEAD
PAGE 44

BOWLAND
PAGE 54

BERNARD
PAGE 64

BEATTIE
PAGE 74

CRISTA
PAGE 84

PUGH
PAGE 94

STERN
PAGE 104

FRICHT
PAGE 114

GRUNDY
PAGE 124

DE DIENES
PAGE 134

YOLMER
PAGE 144

DE MORGOLI
PAGE 154

JOHN
PAGE 164

CHARM PHOTOGRAPHY Vol. 1 No. 1 1987

Published annually by MILDRED MAGUIRE, Inc. 115 W 4th St. New York, NY 10014

Copyright ©1987 by MILDRED MAGUIRE, Inc. Printed in the U.S.A.

Model: Sponsored by MILDRED MAGUIRE, Inc. Model's Name: MILDRED MAGUIRE

David's portrait of the "Glorious Sarah," made in 1855, ranks as glamour photos of all time

Frances's "Frances Folsom Appleton" helped make glamour like this the genre of the '80's

Clara Baldwin, star of Longfellow
Follier poses for Hamilton, portrait bracketed at the Van-Cos era

INTRODUCTION

the history of glamour in photography

From Manhattan's Madison Avenue, where the advertising models are sleek and fit, to Hollywood, where the starlets are curvy and tall, there is one man who already wields influence and power. He is the photographer of glamour—the man who has given America a new visual art. With his Rolles, his Leicas, his Speed Graphics, he records the beauty and the energy, the vigor and passion, that are part and parcel of our culture. Men do this anything, he stands in the vanguard of fashion and beauty by contemporary. Glamour in photography is not a product of our own postwar era, nor is it an exclusively American discovery. The conviction that the proper study of mankind is a beautiful woman has been cherished and fostered by generations since that art and science was revealed.

In fact, if there had never been a beautiful woman one might argue there might never have been photography. Lewis Carroll—the inventor of the camera—used a woman in 1839 as his subject picture-taking experiments. And the kind of portrait photographer, Paul Reade, recommended almost exclusively to women, his 1840 photograph of the magnificent Sarah Remondini is one of the few glimpses we have today of his breathtaking glamour.

Today's models are luckier than their 19th century sisters. Then, a girl had to remain absolutely still for long moments at a time because of the long exposure time needed for the early cameras and plates. But that woman's name is often easily was proven. Shuttered by the discomfort of posing, the ladies looked in studies where Daguerotypes were made, and by 1850 there were already 71 portrait photographers in New York alone.

The first picture to document the classification of "put in" was taken in 1855 by Eugene Delacroix. (This was just after the John Brown had raised the name photography.) Delacroix's model gracefully reclines upon a couch, wearing no more than Marilyn Monroe does in her famous cinematic pose. But a Victorian moralist public was not shocked—by the model was posed against a background suggesting ancient Greece. And that, of course, was Art.

The new art was, nevertheless, shocked simultaneously by the profusions of the period and the flamboyant Frances Hamilton revolutionized the American studio—bringing to it all the beauty, the splendor and the glamour that any photographer could desire. When wanted there's girls in chainmail.

Present-day glamour girl, Clara Bowman, poses for "nude" in early days of motion

Joan Crawford was heart brokenly in 1934's, was outdistanced by her death at 36

Of Evelyn Brent Gable's motion pose that made her famous during World War II

costume and the important beauty of England's leading ladies made Americans and movie stars that Hollywood was not a thing to be hidden or feared at. Glamour photography had tapped a rich new vein of material. The time was to grow even richer as time went on.

Just before the first World War, a new figure came upon the American business scene—the advertising man. In touch with the glamour photographer, he was in touch with new industries, no more new culture. A picture of a beautiful girl, the old man discovered, could sell almost anything. At first the girl was usually a German model, characteristically plump and chastely veiled in discretion. As time went on, the discretion gradually came off.

The genius of Alfred Stieglitz came to the fore about the same time. He was the first photographer intent to prove that a colored model gave a better, more intimate picture. This one concept, in turn, led to another revolution—the "nudest" and the "nudest" camera, made possible by George Eastman's simple, hand-painted Kodak.

Eastman was to do much more for the glamour photographer. He came up with a flexible film that made the movie camera possible. Now you could photograph a model while she moved. Some years later the first motion-made by the American Biograph Company in 1896—was much more daring than anything possible in the years today. And the still photos of the time would make present-day pictures of Joan Crawford seem even daintier.

But the movie made the model—rather than the photographer—famous. Despite efforts to hide the slinking of the stars and actresses, an enchanted public clamored to know the names of the little girl in rags as B. W. Griffith's Lulu. She was Gladys Smith, later known as Lulu Mary, and, finally Mary Pickford—America's sweetheart.

Mary was the first of Hollywood's glamour girls. For the first morning hours were to pack out a long string of others: Clara Bow, Theda Bara, the Gish sisters, Frita Nappi, Janet Gaynor, No one knows, Martha Darnell, Joan Crawford, Carol Lombard, Joan Russell, and today's darling, Miss Joan Dillinger. In each case they were made familiar to us, and famous, through the magic of glamour photography.

In the meantime, beauty contests were keeping the still photographer busy. The first one, in 1891, featured girls as long as those, but somehow went up and up until they disappeared into nothing more—and the glamour photographers went down to the sea.

On the following pages we give you the glamour photography of 1934. It has come a long way since 1906, when John Brown Moulton was a comedian with character who produced with the aid of "Beauty's Patented Fringe Apparatus." For though glamour still remains eternal, the photographer's idea of poses or changes constantly. Here, from the viewpoint of today's best glamour photographers, is the glamour of our time.

the classic image of a glamour girl, Joan Crawford, in typical head-dressing (her story inside)

RAWLINGS

he is a master of high-style photography

"Most professional photographers," says John Rawlings, "have one field which is considered their 'specialty' (any one happens to be fashion photography). However, working with the male offers no escape from the art of generalization."

And again: "In a male photograph, the 'pose' is secondary. Interest doesn't depend on clothes or background, but on body and facial expression. Because of these rigid limitations, the subject offers the photographer a wonderful chance to learn to grips with the minutiae of his work." Rawlings, his contemporary says, has come to grips with the minutiae of his work as a married husband.

He was, certainly not Rawlings himself, could have known, when he left college to make a living, that his ultimate destination would be back on and figure photography. His path to that goal was round about.

He was born in Ohio, spent one year at Ohio Wesleyan University, and, at 19, left for Atlantic City to go into the hotel business. Next he grew restless at show-window display and held several jobs in top New York department stores. When a restaurant-cum-bud except the country, Rawlings embarked on miscellaneous, bought a cheap camera, and was soon photographing everything around him.

Samples of his work were sent to the two magazine publishers Condé Nast (Vogue, Seventeen and Garden, Shimmer), who offered Rawlings a 75 per cent reduction in salary and a chance to work in a top fashion studio. Enthusiasm for Rawlings, accepted, became group was for a group of able fashion photographers and demonstrated male aptitude for his new profession that, in six months, he was recommended to build a new studio—and be the head photographer—for English Vogue in London.

He has done distinguished work for the Condé Nast organization ever since. In 1955, he built his own large, white-tiled studio in New York, where he now carries out major new assignments, does advertising shoots for industrial clients and helps to direct the study list and cluster groups of young photographers working alone.

His wife, Edna, was with Condé Nast 14 years, in Paris, London, and New York. In New York, for several years, she was head fashion editor. They have many children—among them fishing, cross-country, dogs and happy run back on campus days.

Left: Rawlings works in specially built studio, diffused daylight shining through sheer ceiling.

CONTINUED

At left, see Howells, is example of intelligent cooperation by model, who, evading photographer's usual diary movement to gain shot, emerged in by pulling her head low over her position, emphasizing strong neck muscle

Howells can relate composition and exposure of film for perfect symmetry in his work. Results: This charming study in horizontal and vertical

This study of clothing made appeared in Brooks' book, 189 Studies of the Figure (Chicago: Grosset, 1923). "The use," Brooks says, "the natural light of the sun, whether brilliant or overcast, direct or reflected, is preferable for all photography, and never more so than with the nude. The model is not panned down by sunlight but can move about freely . . . [The nude is a universal subject, every camera artist who understands it should be able to make it say something new.]"

This working process of model enough creating her hair with dust.
hard work involves resulted in definite light within picture

RAWLINGS SAYS:

• "The secret of a beautiful woman lies in her carriage and in her figure. The impression she gives depends on her movements. The most beautiful creature will look clumsy and heavy if her figure is not balanced and her movements light and supple. She must give the illusion of being."

"A photographer must in a paid moment—All his planning and arranging must be done before the shutter clicks, so that his one chance has been wisely in establishing that rapport between himself and his model which is so important for successful fashion photography."

"One reason why I prefer diffused natural lighting is because a model looks far more as young without the dark shadow of a spot light. Consequently the natural beauty of her movements can be caught in that elusive instant that becomes the picture."

Katherine Gustaf gives the expert special work in Rawlings' studio.
Bromide use of highlights in her key pictures gives striking effect.

Successful action shot of model from Eugene's exposure reveals Rawlings' mastery of line and balance

2

ENGSTEAD

he makes magic in Hollywood

IN 25 YEARS, John Engstead has developed from a part-time photographer for Paramount Pictures into one of Hollywood's top feature and pleasure cameramen. Engstead has not only worked with the motion picture industry, but his work reflects its pictorial magic-making.

His beautifully posed, softly lighted pictures of stars describe the scenes of romance. His dark, dramatic exposures of Colleen's formal and informal costumes appear in such style-setting journals as Vogue. His sensitive portraits of people, as well as his camera studies of "wild life" surroundings, have won him the business of maintaining New York advertising agencies.

When Reaper's Dance last night on miniature photo screen at West Coast Palace, critics cannot blame engaged Engstead, and his staff has never since on special photographic assignments.

Engstead, who was graduated from Los Angeles High School, went to work at Paramount on the recommendation of silent screen star Lon Chaney, and wrote Abbie for John. One of his early master still pictures was of "In Girl" Clara Bow and it made an immediate impression. Thereafter he continued the photographing of Paramount talent with his talent as publicist, studio director and magazine contact. During this period, Engstead also made friends with such writers of the camera as Leonid Dell Wells and Edward Steichen, who taught him creative photography.

Since then, Engstead has gone far. Today he and his staff are busy at all hours, in his West Hollywood studio. Engstead has become an indispensable still cameraman to the moving picture of Hollywood.

Feature photo for Bruce Randall was made in his efforts to take advantage of soft sunlight.

Pictures also stress use of road show

CONTINUED

ENESTAD SAYS:

■ "The first time I shot a picture was during a photographers' strike. The Paramount publicity department had decided we were to appear on the 10 o'clock, and Cary Grant came in for a test sitting. Before the strike was over, I had pictures of every star on the lot. It was a lucky strike in a tough field."

On the West Coast a photographer has to do many types of pictures. I try to remember what I've learned from top subjects. I also try to shoot pictures the way they want to be presented. I don't always agree, but I can't see much sense in tempering. It is a challenge to see how well one can photograph various assignments."

New movie sensation, Barbara Clayton, was photographed sensationally at request of publisher who used fragment scene to advantage, and obtained a long-term contract for actress.

Feature for Boyer's Blame was stolen by an editor, Barbara Clayton, taken by Ringling on pic. Feature ran in afternoon edition edition.

INTERIOR

Geometric beauty of Pacific Beach that was result of collaboration between photographer and national fashion magazine. Helen Richard was model; scene was Del Mar Club; photo was made at $3,000 in 1948

EXHIBIT

Examination of England's greatest artist in intimate study of Barbara Blotch, lighted and taken during difficult conditions on Las Vegas nightclub floor

England's Dave Adams makes a striking photograph in England's gallery. His work is made possible by imaginative manipulation of props and lights

UNDERTAK

"How To Make a Movie Star" is demonstrated by actress and goddess. Legend captured Miss Stone's beauty as she, Russell Gibson, played pit in all top magazine. The result is a Universal movie role for Miss Stone.

BEATTIE

3

he is a fine photo-illustrator

BORN IN New York City, Richard Beattie has rarely been out of it for any length of time, though he did serve a World War II hitch with the Marines, seeing action on Iwojima and the Philippines.

Beattie's first job was that of messenger boy with the J. Walter Thompson advertising agency. Thereafter he went up the ladder, through all other agency departments, into the photographic section, which he enjoyed and from which he left for the Maroons.

Returning to civilian life, he set up the Beattie-Watts Studio. It has proved highly popular with art directors of big advertising agencies who appreciate Beattie's agency experience and familiarity with their problems. For a change of pace, Beattie likes to cover an unusual story for a magazine.

Handling major advertising accounts often calls for considerable organizing ability on the pictorial angle. Beattie tackles such problems as a narrow distance sight, sometimes taking over a movie studio for the setup. With the help of technicians and other assistants, he spends long days in planning. They collaborate to develop and coordinate pictures giving little hint of the labor involved in producing them.

As Beattie puts it: "One of the simplest things in the world is to click the camera and take a photograph. It may take me only a matter of minutes to get the picture I want. But the organizing, the working out of the assignment in cooperation with the art director, the building up of the setting for the picture—that is neither easier than any other day, even today."

(CONTINUED)

"Beattie is the artistic man who makes picture-taking fun," Mary Beattie says of the pictures of her on these pages.

BEATTIE SAYS:

• "I think of every photographic assignment as a problem in stage direction. With my assistants, I work out a scenario and a stage setting down to the last detail. When everything is set, and I am almost ready to plate a graph, I have the 'actors' in my 'play' rehearse their lines and run over the scene a few times. Then I shoot the scene as rapidly as I can."

"Here I find my experience as printer a great help, as I can anticipate what will be necessary for the darkness and can control the amount of work to be done there. To my mind, getting it right the first time adds greatly to the vitality of a picture."

"The professional photographer must have the talent to visualize an idea and, through mastery of his technique and control of the various elements, make it happen."

Picture required to speed setting but there were 12 people at assignment. Library made sure that rapport between model and photographer

Picture of her was shot in the studio with Mazda lighting. It was taken at slow speed to catch the action of water covering these model's face.

This beauty picture, made with an 8 1/2 18 camera and Mazda lighting, is one of Rex Baker's specialties and hangs in her sitting room.

Smiling Stearns
was taken in studio with Kodachrome, at 1/100 of second at f/8

STEARNS

4

his forte is figure and fashion photography

FIGURE studies and elegant fashion photographs are the two preoccupations of Philip G. Stearns, who opened his own studio in 1950 after an association with John Berke. Before becoming a photographer, he had had a distinguished career in the Army, serving in lieutenant colonel with the Office of Strategic Services in Europe. During this period, Stearns observed three winters, including the Cross de Carrey with palm, awarded to him for organizing parachute operations for the French Resistance Movement.

At this writing, he was preparing a book of essays on the theme of Beauty in Photography. However, he feels, one can be brought to observing aspects of the most commonplace subjects of a picture of a beautiful woman in a casual, almost unperceived way.

He does not believe that fashion photography need be entirely in Stearns' opinion, an example of a good photographer is to take time and use experimental work.

CONTINUED

STEARNS SAYS:

• "For extended periods of time, most women these days are full support between photographer and model during the posing. The model should be able to sense the effect the photographer is trying to achieve. He should make her feel as glamorous as he can, should try to make her see into the pose so that the whole body is elongated and the splendid feeling is reflected in the body's every movement.

"Generally, I use diffused light for fashion photography. For outside shots, I augment natural sources with reflectors or studio light. My favorite camera is a Hasselblad, to which I have added a specially adapted lens, a Liltone lens mount, and one for almost everything."

This photograph shows me originally in color. Greater Hasselblad camera, in direct light, 1/2 second, f/5.6

General fashion model, Pam Elton, poses carefully at the camera to give delicate breathy style

STARRS

This evocative shot of Jay Nicholson by composer of short stories as brilliant master of imaginative photography

SCENES

Kate Winslet and son George are part of a series on glamorous mothers and children and was made with a brother using an aerial lens and sets from the

This picture, made with direct studio lighting, is of amazing model Rita Hayworth, now in retirement. She is wearing a hat by couturier New York milliner, Mr. John

STAIRS

Exquisite fashion model, Nan Grey, poses victoriously at the camera in this delicate pastoral study.

DE DIENES

he loves to photograph beautiful girls

ANDRÉ DE DIENES is a photographer with the soul of a poet. His philosophy of life—and the vibrant photographs which result from it—are based on a love of beauty in nature that is rare and unique. An ardent Hungarian, he believes that all important work must be accomplished with joy and inner satisfaction. Any photo assignment which contradicts his aesthetic sense he declines.

Blond, handsome, just turned 35, de Dienes now lives and works in Hollywood. He has come a long way in distance and distinction since his boyhood in Transylvania, Hungary. As a young man, he took up painting, traveled in Europe and North Africa, and had his own trial and error pursuit of beauty.

At the age of 23, André bought his first camera and at once found his medium of expression. From the beginning, it was a thrilling venture. From the beginning, too, he photographed beautiful women—and, after nearly 20 years, he is still at it.

Enthusiasm for his subject, response to her appeal, deftly explains upon the camera's plate of each personality, all these are evident in his pictures. And, as a matter of policy, he will not shoot a picture unless its subject and composition meet his high standards.

Today de Dienes ranks among the most talented and creative of American cameramen. His professional forte, his career, has been beautiful girls and he is proud of it. Whether they are stars or strikers does not matter. "Without exceptions," he declares, "I can state that over the past 20 years—both in Europe and in America—I must have photographed a thousand beautiful women."

CONTINUED

Deanes captured Florence's large hair and in make de Dienes picture. Action was "Dienes" at 1:00PM of second

de DIENES SAYS:

"Before I photograph a person, famous or not, that person has to appeal to me in many ways. I like to possess the soul and soulful, health and vitality which exist in every person. If my work does not represent these things, I am unhappy."

"I photograph just what I like to photograph—I do not work contrary to my taste or yearning to express myself. To me, finding enjoyment in one's work is far more important than striving for power and fortune."

"It may sound strange for me to say so, but that I make my headquarters in glamorous old Hollywood, but I believe no man should tell his womanly glam out about."

"It is true love, true friendship, a true meeting of minds and spiritual kinship which should guide one instantly when a man considers love."

4 Hollywood, sports, business and other scenes showing photos of actress Barbara Payton. Close-up not made as 1/100 of second as full

Hollywood beauty Marilyn Riddle emerges from the sun shaded and tanned to reveal a radiant subject for nature-loving Hungarian business

IT RICHES continued

In a shimmering outdoor portrait, darkened with sun and shadow, actress Romy von Sierstorf poses between assignments.

Exuding young girl's beauty in Andrew's film, it takes

Sleeping beauty gone by New York model Kay Nelson reveals another aspect of de Munné's photographic technique—the ability to suggest a woman's mystery

DE DIERES

Professional dancer Shalva Levin, displaying circus agility, does the somersault for cowboys at Junes Beach near
New York City

Catching sportive action of Yvett Baker at 1/100 of a second with an f/11 aperture opening, the Elmore captures memorable "Fox" phase of jump. Picture was a prize winner in several national exhibitions.

6 JOFFÉ

he went from motion to still pictures

CONSTANTIN JOFFÉ, a talented Russian émigré, took his entire livelihood by the Camera, and is a photographer who switched from motion to still pictures. Today he is president of Studio Associates, a cooperative group of photographers in New York.

Joffé, who studied at the film school of Berlin in the early '20s, got his start as the motion picture field with the great UFA film company. Under the direction of the famed Ernst Lubitsch he worked as assistant on such early movie masterpieces as Metropolis and Conquest of the Heavens. With the rise of Hitler, however, Joffé left the Firm where he was concerned on the film Goetz of Fierstein.

It was during his Paris period that Joffé turned to fashion photography. Shortly he built a studio and a reputation with French fashion magazines and advertisements. His steady rise was interrupted by World War II in which he joined the French Army, was wounded and taken prisoner by the Germans.

After the war, this participant photographer emigrated to the United States, took $50 in his pocket. For a while, he worked as a freelance business and then joined Condé Nast Publications. He resigned in 1950 to form his own organization.

Joffé is interested in personally see the East, and is a student of culture. He says of western civilization: "Our tragedy is that we are living in a competitive society, while the Indian philosophers are living in a contemplative society. The meaning of the two problems makes."

DM/PLM

Here Lee Baeck, a favorite Joffé model, makes pose. Picture was shot on 1/50 of second, for fashion magazine

JOFFE SAYS:

• "I believe it is possible to glimpse a man's soul when attending his business. This almost mystic feeling on the part of the photographer—coupled with her action and technical ability—is vital for a photopainter."

"When I shoot glamour pictures there is almost psychological warfare between the model and myself—a controversial battle to secure the model's interest and make her open light up. That is the moment I like to catch."

In carefully-arranged pictures for ad spaces, like Transpacific registers appeal for "gypsy blood" appeal. Joffe took shot with a Loretta

In photo of different mood, which Joffe calls "sensuously erotic scenes," model offers another glimpse of a young lady in the mirror.

1890

"Motion picture" effect of this fashion photograph was achieved by snapping photo as first passenger train flitted by mannequin.

In picture for a big fashion magazine, Elle (overridden there leading U. S. models, Jean Parson, Berlin, Lucy Fisher

7

STRATE

he believes: "To portray motion is to portray life"

A COSMOPOLITAN camera man is Walter Strate, who lives in New York, was born in Krimm, went to school in Switzerland, won a degree in Law at Australia University of Victoria and began his photographic career in Paris.

Blended with an accurate sense of other scenes, he can and does devote his days to his big Greenwich Village studio to the creation of still and motion pictures of the dance. There he frequently finds his subjects—ballet dancers, mostly—among neighbors.

Among his not extraordinary films of the dance are The Dangerous Dance, with Victoria Bottom, Street's Fantasy, in color, with Jane Lanier (winner of Edinburgh Festival Prize 1956), and The Legend, with Jane Lanier, Lucienne Lale and Ellen Lane (winner of Edinburgh Festival Prize 1951 and 1954 Biennial Film Festival prize in Venice). At the writing, he was planning to produce a full-length film, A Field Full of Sunflowers, in Italy with Italian cinematographers. He was also working on a book, A Decade of the Dance in New York, to feature his best work of the past few years. Among the State's commercial associates was Ellen Lale's studio.

His first work was done with a Bellini lens. He now uses a Swedish Hasselblad which, though small, has the lens of an 8x10 camera. He uses completely diffused lighting—"never a thing to run down," he says.

Before he takes a single picture, Strate makes himself familiar with what even ballet he considers picture good. Then he works out his photographic sequence, decides the camera to his studio and has them re-enact the scenes of the ballet he wishes to photograph. Then he plans ahead of time what appears to be spontaneous action shots.

(Continued)

Subjects of Strate's dancing pictures (right) in dancer Natalie Rosta, wearing swirling costume for the ballet Le Foy Flying.

GOWLAND

he is a hollywood pin-up-photographer

Hollywood's Peter Gowland, handsome enough to be one of the city's movie actors, instead spends his time shooting them.

After a decade of photography worldwide's films, he is rated as one of America's top-flight amateur artists.

The son of silent screen star Gilson Gowland, he attended both Hollywood High School and London Professional School, the latter with such promising teen-agers as Betty Grable, Judy Garland and Mickey Rooney. Graduating in 1935, he was accepted at Harvard, 10th Century Fox and MGM—and played small roles in a dozen films.

Meanwhile, he played at photography. By 1941, he could count the lives here as longer and passed North American Airlines as a commercial. Simultaneously, Gowland began picturing the lovely young actresses who lived on the Hollywood Studio Club, usually on days off spent at the beach.

Then for Peter, as for many another young man in the 1940's, the world exploded. He fell in love and married Alice Adams. He joined the Army and wound up along the Rhine. He married his wife again. Returned from Arizona to the Alps, taking better pictures with each new bout of duty.

Released from the armed forces in 1946, Gowland hit his stride. He hung out a semi-legal sign, "Peter Gowland," and began photographing a sun-bright blonde model, Fox Hall. Hall paid off—and Gowland color covers and black-and-white spreads began to appear in national magazines. Gowland Girls, a special brand of laughing, long-legged American womanhood, became give-up heroines with curvaceous and GPs sides.

Working on assignment as "open," Gowland starts pin-up stars regularly for Joe, Collier's, U.S. Camera, Pageant, and assorted women magazines. From one here, lovely model, Fox Hall, has pleasure and she has expanded to more than 1,000 covers, including the top talent of major studios.

With photographs, the proof is in the pictures. With Gowland's glittering four-color covers, each woman seems as Virginia Mayo, Anne Dahl, Tony Martin, prove they are as their shining best when looking for him.

CONTINUED

Gowland considering movie beauty actress for model (above), smiling he wife Alice

In making this striking pose-up of female model Betty Hutton, the photographer used soft window light which is ideal exposure against white background of dress and rug.
Technical data: 1/25 at normal or f-8 on Super 88 film.

HOWLAND SAYS:

■ "Imagine! People say to me 'Imagine photographing beautiful women and getting paid for it!'"

"How did I fall into this wonderful pit?"

"When I was thirteen, my mother bought me a 187 Kodak (I could have done in three feet!) and in 1928 she got me one of the first Automatic Kodak boxes. I began to photograph beautiful girls I met while working as an actor in the cinema.

"For the past 50 years, I have spent most of my photographing women. The job isn't quite as much fun as in the old days, but, even so, my wife and I feel that our best pictures are those we are just making.

"Nearly all Howland pictures are taken with a Belliflex (I have owned thirteen different models since the first in 1930). While I am shooting with one, my wife is looking another.

"We don't like to change their looks, so we shoot our indoor and outdoor color with Kodachrome FF's. Our black and white are made with a Kodakstar V because it weighs only 24½ lbs. We use a 5x7 view for color and a 35mm Nikon for candida. We are now writing a book on Stern Photography. It is entitled, naturally, How to Photograph Women."

Photographer wears a towel around his waist at Joyce Center and, using window light in L/1956, makes her look like a temptress

HOWLAND continued

Greenman's change of pose is dramatically illustrated in these two evening, but contrasting, shots (left and below) of Howland's first photographed model, Barbara Greenman. "She has the best figure in Hollywood," he says, "and a talent for posing gracefully. She also makes her own costume suits and dresses."

Miss Greenman, who paints, designs and creates make-up, adapts "Hercules" look (above) and marking of pose (left) to create two strikingly different pictures. Howland took negative photo with his Rolle at 1/250 of second at $f/8$ and indoor scene at 1/125 at $f/8$.

HOWARD COSTUME

Eyes are natural—and occasionally—goose in some Costume glasses photos. Here, using red filter for moonlight effect, for "Stage" by Langstaff at 1/250th of second.

"The female figure," says Corboud, "was by far of the most difficult as well as most interesting subjects in the world to photograph. In my pictures, I try to produce figure photos that are important, yet show the body's beautiful lines in an artistic way."

CHRISTA

she adds female allure to fashion

CHRISTINA (she does not use her full name) is best known for posing a Hollywood glam in fashion photography. It is her strong mind talent to take movie starlets and musical actresses and blend them into photos, yet commercial, yet artistic. And, in the week including in Hollywood, many actresses consistently creep into her high-style photographs.

Christa was born and educated in Berlin, Germany. As a young girl, she worked in a model both in Europe and the United States. She was discovered, however, that she preferred working on the other side of the camera. So, after coming to Los Angeles in the early 1940's, she took two important steps: 1) she purchased a Bellaflex camera, and 2) she enrolled as a student in the Los Angeles Art Center School. Her sense of composition and arrangement, as well as her previous painting skill, improved so remarkably that she later became an instructor at the school.

Today, when 80 years as a freelance photographer, Christa is a mature camera artist and as attractive as most of her models. Her preoccupation with her first enthusiasm, photography, is challenged by only one other nothing—her love of fancy food dishes which she prepares with culinary skill. In the kitchen, she "sometimes say my down history" and then she simply adds, "attention held a more immediate reward."

"In photography," Christa says, "there seems to be an way to experience full experience of joy and satisfaction, disappointment and frustration. I know of no non-photography rules, so do's and don'ts which can affect the other subjectivity of making pictures."

"Back Working" Christa, Christa really shows composition, connecting black-and-white, her trademark

(Continued)

Posing for camera at 1/250 of a second and using studio lighting, Christa Link (opposite dancer in past of magazine for national magazine)

CHRISTA SAYS:

"For me, photography is a decidedly personal matter. I choose my models with great care. I work preferentially with natural situations and natural light, leaving many of the decisions to the inspiration of the moment. I find that to adhere to any one method is to limit oneself. This danger exists, naturally, in everyone's career, if for no other reason than it's a path of least resistance."

Barbara Demers, using R&B models, poses for program portraits highlighted by natural lighting

10

PRIGENT

he finds fashion photography all-rewarding

ROGER PRIGENT is the top fashion photographer. His last fashion photography was plenty satisfying and has no need to experiment outside it.

This may be partly because he is comparatively new—and highly successful—in the field. A Paris man, he joined the French Air Force in North Africa as a photographer in World War II. After the war, he studied painting and architecture. In 1946, he worked for a brief period as a still camera man with various French film companies, but did not really get his stride until 1968, when he visited his sister Yvonne in Washington, where she is employed at the French Embassy.

At that point, Prigent became associated with Lillian Ruessner and Paul Hammett, two good friends and actors who, like Prigent, have photographed the beauty contestants of Charles James, Lilly Sachs, Moushine and many others. In the spring of 1966, Prigent opened his own rooftop studio, built this as a lifetime career and overlooking the sweeping panorama of New York.

His photographic approach, he says, is utilitarian, in the sense that the calculated effect he wants to create is almost invariably brought about by technical means.

"I hate all props," declares Prigent, "and very often I don't have time to go as far as to the beach or elsewhere. Consequently, I have to create the illusion of an outdoor shot by lighting and mood. To my mind beauty is abstract, and I try to capture the feeling that the model is not quite real."

"The model is all important. In my work is highly stylized, the model must be highly intelligent."

(Continued)

Picture of environmental artist Leigh was for the recent Shaker 1-5000; last evening, 1-5000

PRIGENT SAYS:

■ "I find hands are generally a model's major problem. She usually knows how to pose every other part of her body to advantage, but as a rule I set her hands myself to get the exact effect I have in mind.

"It is important to catch a pose as fast as looks spontaneous.

"There is a moment between the careful placing of the clothes and the model's stylized movement which must be caught, so that, although it is highly posed, the picture nevertheless has life and spontaneity."

Vegetation of high-style clothes is highlighted by low-key lighting, Prigent says. Reflections in female camera—"I can judge the fringe more clearly in the right than in any other."

French model Gaby (left) tips wine. Shadow effect is created by studio lighting and mood of the photo.

no 11

YULSMAN

he photographs both science and glamour

PHILADELPHIA-BORN Jerry Yulsman is essentially a science-minded photographer who takes glamour photos for release from. His regular assignments for the slick paper national magazines include photo essays on such subjects as New War Games and Naval Air Experimental Stations. As a documentary recorder of intricate engineering and scientific developments, Yulsman is top.

His taking for glamour photography is equally sensitive. But, as he points out, in glamour photography the rules are different. An industrial plant is stationary, unchangeable, geometrically correct and in the foreground and he snaps it. When photographing a personality, on the other hand, Yulsman tries to capture an easy, natural feeling as the subject comes through his normal routine in normal surroundings. He takes as many pictures as possible.

Yulsman, a graduate of New York University, became serious about photography as a career in his late teens. During World War II, he joined the Army Air Force, in which he held the rank of Top Sergeant, gained and took his camera with him on every mission.

One of his "assignments" as a war lieutenant involved standing up as on duty to photograph an Army machine. He was surprised and hardly equipped with his life and his pictures.

It was such chance Air Force features—the capture of which he struggled out of Africa in technicolor tubes—which opened up to him the possibilities of photojournalism as a career.

CONTINUED

A versatile lensman, Yulsman also photographs delicately posed nudes like figure (left) when through a variable blind and double printed

YULSMAN SAYS:

• "In my photographs, I like to capture a natural, graceful pose. That is one reason why I like to do glamour pictures only as a hobby. Thus I can take all the time I want to shoot a picture. As a rule, I do not use fashion models, they are too stylized. For glamour, I prefer a girl who has expressive movements."

Long, like face and unusual lighting of this figure make it an arresting nature study. Using some Kodakflex for series on industrial jobs, Welton made photo at 1025. 25.8

CHRISTY 12

he aims to help glamorize the American girl

GLAMOURING the American Girl is the photographic purpose of Irving C. Christensen. Known as "Christy" among persons of streaming young models distinguished by careful posing and vibrant drab tones, Christensen Studios in New York employs more than 50 persons. There Christy utilizes his talents as actor, painter, and layout expert to shoot a steady stream of pictures for magazines, all agencies and commercial clients.

A tall, energetic man with white hair, Christy's studio has generously quietly retreating and enjoys working with him.

It will not be Christy's last if someday the Christy Carl is not as known as the Edward Gell was 50 years ago, when this photographer of Swedish descent was born in Geneva, Ill. Christy obtained his formal education by attending the Chicago Art Institute, the Chicago Academy of Art and the American Art Academy. In 1907, in association with a Chicago art student, he organized "Whitaker-Christensen Studio." In 1912, Christy opened as New York branch and in 1915 became its sole proprietor.

"Christy Carl" found Thompson poses for news in New York studio. Christy took photo with electric light on 7/14.

(Continued)

CHRISTY SAYS:

• "Every woman expects when told she is lovely, as I hope by emphasizing her beauty in the subject. I have photographed many girls because in Florence, Jean Parker, Jackie Longfellow and Phyllis Kirk but I still find that photographs quickly hard to make, and I still like to experiment with their faces. It seems to me that the photographer is the modern counterpart of the medieval artist. Under the restraining art, director takes the place of the painter of the days of the Renaissance."

Beautiful Jean Robertson (left and right), "selling" for a national cigarette firm, runs through a dazzling series of shots for Charley and Kenyon Edwards, ad agency

BERNARD

13

he works under the name Bernard of Hollywood

BORN IN Santa Barbara, and now a U.S. citizen, Bernard of Hollywood trained twenty-five years before coming to the States.

As a young man, he had three interests—psychology, which he studied in European universities; the stage (he had secret hopes of becoming an actor); and photography, which he practiced as a hobby. For a man with these interests, he finds Hollywood as a pretty satisfactory city to live in.

Bernard came to America in 1937 and took a postgraduate course in psychology at the University of California. Here he met and was much impressed by the famous Max Raskin and William Dettle.

By 1948 his photography was no longer a hobby but a full-time vocation. He began to sign his Bernard of Hollywood studies and at one time had seven of them in and around the city. He was also photographer at the Elmer Club in Palm Springs, where movie stars relax, and got to know them well while they were being there, miles away from the camera.

In 1950, he became best known for his pictures of Hollywood glamour actresses. In 1952 he published a book of samples of his work entitled Pin Ups, by Bernard of Hollywood. Bernard tries to make these pin-ups with a different—more—more difference, he feels, as his long acquaintance with the actresses and awareness of what makes them tick.

"As a student of psychology," he says, "I am fascinated by people. I try to understand them and I find that the most worth while aspect of photography is to record personality as the subject of film."

(Continued)

Picture on right shows specialty lenses like the eye which were not called "The Visible Eye."

■ "For many years I photographed character studies of men, like the recent portrait of Clark Gable. I had lost a critical magazine career as a reviewer, and as a change of technical approach, I started to photograph the full figure. Once again, I try to use the psychological approach, which, I feel, makes the difference between a mere record of fact and a living, vital portrait. I try to combine European sensibilities in people with American techniques and control of the camera."

Below: Jeanne Crain poses before mirror for double exposure illustration of her beauty

◀ Frontal picture on left captures special charm of actress Paul Kayton

14

PUHN

he learned his trade the hard way

A NATIVE New Yorker, Al Puhn is proud of his city, his work and his way to success—the hard way. It was in 1935, while trying every job from laundry to shoe salesman, that this big, impetuous product of Manhattan's East Side discovered photography. It was a case of love at first sight.

Today, 20 rough and ready years later, Puhn is a successful feature business whose work is in steady demand by editors of agencies and picture magazines like Life by painting and sculpture, and he has some broad contacts and reputation by photographing such artists as Hugo Brehm, Adolf Dehn and Zorach.

Puhn completed his first picture story while on a cross-country trip with a friend who had won a newspaper prize. Back in New York, he worked in a factory by day while he pursued his new career by night. From 1940 to 1943, he was staff cameraman for the Harlem feature newspaper, The Pulse.

For the past decade, he has been busy. With magazine readers, his thousands of books in the bank, bookstores at work, nightclubs opening and pleasure parks at play have won him a following.

continued

In creative mind study of sculpture and model, not being known Al Puhn studies Zorach as work in city-lighted studio

PUHN SAYS:

• "When I shoot a picture, I try to stand outside it (as it were), so that I can be completely objective about it. I conceive the photographer's role to be similar to that of the film director—and I control the visual shooting situation in the same way, but do it as much discreetly as possible.

"I try never to lose the excitement of building a dream into a reality, that is what happens whenever a picture is set up. Just as the photographing of moments with poets must be carefully planned, so models must be prepared to fit into the kind of photo dream! Consequently, I have no favorite model. The models I like best are those who can follow my instructions and who naturally adjust to every setting.

"I find photography especially stimulating as spite of the hard work. It is a profession which encompasses a limitless range of subjects and experience. My classical career as many years has been a great help to me in carrying out advertising assignments, as well as in doing documentary studies on many aspects of modern society."

A regular photographer for nationally advertised products, Paula Struss entered print for other history at National Geographic (1980 at 144).

In a book about sequences for picture magazines, Virginia Smith compares who usually to Paula Struss. My work covers both glamour as well as industry.

GRUNDY ¹⁵

he is a new photographic talent

A AMERICANIZED Englishman—he was born in Surrey—Douglas Grundy is a resident of New York City. A former architect, he emerges as a new photographic talent. On assignment assignments he ranges the field, but his favorite subjects are architecture and glamour.

Grundy led an unusual early life. As a young man, he studied architecture in Germany. In 1938, realizing that war was imminent, he left Berlin for London and enlisted in the R.A.F. His flying career ended abruptly in November, 1943, when the night bomber on which he was co-pilot was shot down over East Prussia. For the next 34 years, he was a prisoner of war.

Grundy's war experience was valuable for two reasons: first, as a prisoner, he read many books on photography and, second, he got to know hundreds of Americans who were fellow prisoners. Following his release, he remained in the Continent for another year as an interpreter at military conferences in Berlin, Hamburg and Kiel.

His first photographic job was in Montreal, where he worked during 1949 for a fashion studio. Moving to the U.S., he soon drew natural photographer assignments. Today, he directs his photographic operations from his Greenwich Village studio.

CHARTER

"Experiment in Line and Form" in title of creating black-and-white photo, shot in natural light at 1/250 of second

GRUNDY SAYS:

■ "To use a picture is always a design. Background patterns and colors should all blend into a harmonious whole. With my architectural training, I am fascinated by lines and curves, and I find that a strong wedding of the two in a picture increases its impact. I prefer to work on subjects that provide a challenge and need thought in composition. Impersonated models tend to show down the power of shooting. Impersonated models help give me a sense of direction."

"I like to experiment with creative backgrounds, painting them myself, as this seems to be a way to reveal potential images."

*Emile Anson, Fifth Ave., standing in front
with Eric Flann, making wedding cake picture in picture of wedding cake*

*Emile Anson, composed of (Emile) Anson in a wedding, creates this symmetrical picture for Grundy's camera
in Finger Lake Hotel*

16

DE MORGOLI

he has Parisian's approach to glamour

SLUCK, black-haired, black-haired Margot is a Parisian with a Parisian's approach to glamour photography. The sense of class, the religious pose, the dramatic gesture, the stillness of face and figure all mark the portraits and "photo reports" of this once-planted Frenchman.

De Margot, who has been Paris Match's photography editor in the U. S. since 1968, began his professional career as an actor. Then he began working as a still photographer for the movie artist, Pierre Renoir. His first commercial work was an exclusive story on the wedding of the Duchess of Kent, which appeared both in French and American magazines. After the war he opened his own studio and joined Goff's Paris staff.

In the U.S., his first magazine assignment was a feature on Ringling Brothers Circus, Tokyo, "With the Monkeys" concentrates on "talking" and shows how new ideas through the medium of evening photography. Currents, Calves and Dances, Dances are two more "series" whose rise was spurred by his pictures.

©1974/200

"Was on the Beach," a picture with still photography of a girl and sand sculpture, was shot at L100 in July

Yolande Beaulieu, 1951 Miss America, poses on daring board after winning Beauty crown in Atlantic City

Elaine Stewart, 1938's new glamour queen, smiles happily after finishing first in maria Forum Pageant

de MORGOLI SAYS:

• "I never pose a model.
That is the best way to kill the natural charm of a beautiful woman. For do I not prefer natural models, their young smiles to me forced and unnatural. According to the mood, the light, the dress the girl is wearing, I make the picture spontaneous, gay or serious.
My favorite model is the simplest girl in the world.

"Usually, I use a Redhead,
but I also like a Spad-Complex, the Green, the new Japanese version of the Lotus. My perfected technique is to work around the model, rather than having her constantly in the view."

Exposed photos of models

Jane Clark is caught at de Mungell's shell as model glances backward

Marilyn Monroe, today's epitome of glamour, glances over her shoulder at photographer Nick de Longis in April 1949 pose

How outstanding pictures are made in the field of beauty

Great photographs of the world's most beautiful women, taken by the country's leading glamour photographers.